

Upper Valley Museum at Leavenworth

Barn Beach Reserve

The home of the Upper Valley Museum at Leavenworth is the former Haus Lorelei, a 103-year-old structure built as the Lamb-Davis bungalow, which for many years was the home of Field family. The house and surrounding land is now known as the Barn Beach Reserve. At 347 Division Street, it covers approximately five acres from the Wenatchee Riverfront to the residential area at Commercial Street and Division Street.

Also on the property is an educational facility with classrooms and a large hall where presentations can be given and local artists can display their work. This building's architecture resembles that of a barn, recalling the barn and pasture area and where the Field family raised purebred Arabian horses.

The Upper Valley Museum at Leavenworth was established in July of 2002 as a division of the Wenatchee Valley Museum and Cultural Center. A Steering Committee of volunteers set policy and was the overseer of the daily operations of the museum. The museum has been providing exhibits and educational programs for the Upper Wenatchee Valley community for the last four years.

In September of 2006, the museum became independent and a new organization, the Upper Valley Historical Society, was formed to operate the Upper Valley Museum.

The Upper Valley Museum is open on weekend afternoons at the Barn Beach Reserve overlooking the Wenatchee River at 347 Division Street.

The Upper Valley Museum has a Gift Shop where you can purchase educational and interesting items.

Programs for 2007 will continue at the Barn Beach Reserve.

We look forward to seeing you at the Upper Valley Museum at Leavenworth.
